GAME INSTRUCTIONS:

Supplies:

- "question cards" from above printed and cut out (you can mount them on cardstock if you like)
- die
- place marker for each player (you can steal these from another game, like Monopoly, or use coins or squares of colored paper)
- a simple game board – just a path of squares (again, you can steal from another game or just make your own by gluing paper squares to a piece of cardstock)

Play:

The game begins by all players rolling a die, the high roll chosen to be the first "dasher". The dasher draws a "question card" from the stack writes her answer on a piece of paper. She then reads the question aloud, and all other players write down the answer that they think the dasher put (or make up an answer that sounds convincing). The players hand their definitions to the dasher, who reads the answers aloud in random order. Players record which answer they believe truly belongs to the dasher.

Players are awarded three points if the answer they wrote matches the dasher's answer. They are awarded two points if they guess the correct answer after they are all read aloud. Players are awarded one point for each other player who incorrectly chooses the fake answer they wrote. The dasher is awarded three points if no one guesses the correct answer.

For each point awarded, players move their tokens around the game board one square. The role of dasher then passes to another player. The winner is the individual whose token reaches the end square first.
